Although both matte and glossy cabinets are classic choices that have been used in new homes for decades, flat, matte cabinets, and countertops for that matter, have been trending now more than ever. Designers consider matte cabinets to be chic and contemporary, but they can be used in any style space. Ironically, Matte cabinets have also become very popular in Europe, where glossy cabinets dominated the market for many years.

High-Shine + Stainless Steel

Modern, stainless steel appliances are joined by minimalist lacquered cabinetry in this open concept kitchen. The inky cabinets feature a fashionable lacquer finish that mirrors the reflective surface of the appliances tucked into the space. A pair of copper pendants dangle overhead and matching, metallic copper canisters litter the countertops to continue the high-shine style used throughout the design.

High gloss finishes entered the realm of kitchen cabinetry several years ago via the top European design houses. Since then the popularity of the high gloss design has increased, and high-gloss finish is becoming more prominent in everything from kitchens and baths, to closets and furniture. At every level, high gloss has proven a very popular finish that will likely continue to thrive.

The classic approach to high gloss is to simultaneously apply paint and a high gloss lacquer to wood or mdf. This is best when it is professionally applied to ensure a uniform sheen. Lacquer is a good material for high-gloss finishes because it's easy to work with and can be sanded flat and polished to a high gloss. The problem with high-gloss finishes is that with crisp reflections surface defects are very obvious. The finishing process is highly labor intensive which can makes it more expensive than other options.

Other options for high gloss cabinets are thermofoil, acrylic, laminate and UV panels. This relatively new material is increasing in popularity due to its contemporary look and durability. These options waterproof, will not warp or yellow in the sun.

Traditional laminates, both HPL and TFM, offer high gloss finishes. There are several ways that this is achieved, including specialty overlays and technologies that impart textures (including press plates, release papers and belts). Technical Hot Coating is another method that is beginning to make its way into the North American laminates market. For this process PUR is heated and applied in an even coat directly over melamine. In all cases the panel is sealed. Laminates are typically scratch and water resistant, characteristics that are increased with hot Coating.
